From earthquakes to 21st century hide-and-seek
Online journal focuses on environment and outdoor recreation

What is the likelihood that Pennsylvania could have an earthquake of magnitude 5.8 or greater—similar to the August 23 earthquake in Virginia? What is the September 11 National Memorial Trail, and what is the Pennsylvania portion of the route? What is “geocaching” and how can I get started in this 21st century version of hide-and-seek? These questions, and more, are answered in the October 2011 issue of The Hemlock, available online at <http://www.lhup.edu/hemlock/Hemlock51.htm>

The October Hemlock also includes a poem, an article on the Farrandsville CCC Camp; the regular “hike of the month” feature; and an article on Nature Abounds, a non-profit organization bringing people together for a healthy planet.

The Hemlock is Lock Haven University’s online journal devoted to environmentalism, outdoor recreation, and the culture of Pennsylvania. The Hemlock is a production of the Environmental Focus Group, which is committed to promoting and supporting activities, experiences, and structures that encourage students, faculty, and staff to develop a stronger sense of place for Lock Haven University and central Pennsylvania.

Lock Haven University is a member of the Pennsylvania State System of Higher Education (PASSHE), the largest provider of higher education in the commonwealth.
